

Last week, the House adopted the Kirk-Larsen amendment to the Higher Education bill. Our bipartisan amendment expressed the sense of the Congress that, among all languages taught in U.S. exchange programs, we should set a priority on Arabic and Chinese.

The swift adoption of the Kirk amendment reflects a growing Republican and Democratic consensus that much of America's economic, diplomatic and military future depends on deep linguistic and cultural understanding of communities that speak these two difficult languages.